The 3d Marine Division

THE 3D MARINE DIVISION, officially activated 16 September 1942, at Camp Elliott, San Diego, California, was built around the 9th Marines. Major General Charles D. Barrett became the first commanding general of the division. As the year drew to a close, the 3d Division, still in the process of training and organization, consisted of three infantry regiments, the 9th, 21st, and 23d Marines; an artillery regiment, the 12th Marines; an engineer regiment, the 19th Marines; special troops composed of the 3d Headquarters Battalion, the 3d Parachute Battalion, the 3d Tank Battalion, and the 3d Special Weapons Battalion; the 3d Service Battalion; the 3d Medical Battalion; and the 3d Amphibian Tractor Battalion. All of these units were located at Camp Elliott, except the 21st and 23d Marines, which were at New River, North Carolina.

IN JANUARY AND FEBRUARY 1943, the division moved from Camp Elliott to Auckland, New Zealand. On 23 May 1943, the 3d Marines (Reinforced), then on Samoa, joined the 3d Marine Division, replacing the 23d Marines.

BY AUGUST 1943, all major units of the division were stationed on Guadalcanal where special training and rehearsals for the Bougainville operation were intensified. On 1 November 1943, the division, with the 3d and 9th Marines in assault, landed at Empress Augusta Bay, Bougainville; the 21st Marines followed in six days. For approximately two months the division, now commanded by Major General Allen H. Turnage, fought in the front lines against stiff and heavy enemy resistance. On 16 January 1944, with the transfer of command in the area to the Army's XIV Corps, the last elements of the 3d Marine Division returned to Guadalcanal.

FOLLOWING THE BOUGAINVILLE OPERATION, the division began training for the next campaign. Verbal instructions received in February 1944 led to planning for an operation against the Japanese on Emirau Island. The projected Emirau operation was subsequently cancelled and verbal instructions were received to initiate planning for an operation against enemy forces at Kavieng, New Ireland. This operation was also called off, and a few days later the division received word to start training for the amphibious assault against Guam in the Mariana Islands.

THE DIVISION EMBARKED AT GUADALCANAL, 2 and 3 June 1944, and sailed for Kwajalein, Marshall Islands, enroute to the Marianas. It remained afloat off Saipan from 15 to 28 June 1944, as part of the reserve force for the Saipan operation then being carried out by the 2d and 4th Marine Divisions in conjunction with the 27th Infantry Division. With the situation on Saipan well controlled, the 3d Marine Division returned to its restaging area awaiting a new target date for the Guam operation.

ON 21 JULY 1944, as a part of the Southern Troops and Landing Force, the 3d Marine Division, with three regiments abreast, landed on the western beaches of Guam, in the vicinity of Asan Point. After 20 days of savage fighting, the division troops reached the northern coast of the island. On 10 August 1944 Guam was declared secure. Until its departure for the Iwo Jima campaign, the division remained on Guam taking part in the mopping-up operations.

BY THE MIDDLE OF FEBRUARY 1945, the 3d Marine Division completed embarkation at Guam preparatory to participation in the Iwo Jima operation. Initially the division remained afloat off Iwo Jima as Expeditionary Troops Reserve. One regiment, the 21st Marines, landed on 21 February. The remaining units (less the 3d Marines in floating reserve) landed on 24 February, and the next morning the 3d Marine Division launched an attack in its zone between the 4th and 5th Marine Divisions.

THE 3D MARINE DIVISION faced well-organized and determined enemy resistance. The terrain, ideal for defense, was heavily fortified by pillboxes, caves, and covered artillery emplacements. Progress was slow and casualties heavy during the first few days of fighting. The division slowly pushed the enemy back and by 3 March had severed the last enemy east-west artery of communication by occupying positions overlooking the sea. The 3d Division secured its zone of action on 11 March and then initiated intensive patrolling and mopping-up operations. On 16 March, units of the 3d Division relieved elements of the 5th Division and delivered the final attack of the Iwo Jima operation—a drive toward Kitano Point. Iwo Jima was declared secure on the same day. On 4 April, the 3d Marine Division was relieved by Army units.

BY MID-APRIL 1945, all units of the division were back on Guam, preparing for the next operation. In addition, the division patrolled the southern part of the island. On 3 August 1945, the 3d Marine Division received initial plans for Operation Olympic which called for an amphibious landing on the Japanese home island of Kyushu about 1 November 1945. The 3d Marine Division, along with the 2d and 5th Marine Divisions, was assigned to the V Amphibious Corps for the projected operation. Japan's agreement to cease hostilities and subsequent surrender cancelled Olympic, and the 3d Marine Division remained on Guam until the date of its deactivation on 28 December 1945.

Erskine, Commander of the 3d Marine Division, on the division's valorous service in breaking the backbone of Japanese resistance on the island.

THE 3D MARINE DIVISION was reactivated on 7 January 1952, at Camp Pendleton, California. Brigadier General Mettrill B. Twining became temporary division commander until the arrival of Major General Robert H. Peppet on 15 February 1952. Immediately after its activation and still in its organizational state, the division began intensive combat training, including new tactics and maneuvers based on lessons learned in the Korean War. During the remaining part of 1952, elements of the division participated in numerous exercises and training problems, including vertical envelopment (helicopter landing), airborne operations and attack, and defense against atomic weapons and missiles. By the end of 1952 the division consisted of all its organic elements; three infantry regiments (the 3d, 4th, and 9th Marines); an artillery regiment (the 12th Marines); and all divisional support elements.

IN AUGUST 1953, the bulk of the 3d Marine Division, commanded by General Pepper, arrived in Japan to support the 1st Marine Division in Korea in the defense of the Far Eastern area. The division remained in Japan until early 1956 when it redeployed to Okinawa. The 4th Marines and various supporting elements became part of the 1st Brigade in Hawaii.

ON 6 MARCH 1965, forward elements of the division made an amphibious landing at Da Nang, Republic of Vietnam. Early in April, division units were helilifted to Hue/Phu Bai to assume defense of the area. The headquarters, 3d Marine Division Forward, under the command of Major General William R. Collins, was located in Da Nang on 6 May. The Chu Lai area came under control of the 3d Division on 12 May. Major General Lewis W. Walt assumed command of the division in June 1965.

AFTER a 1 July Viet Cong attack on Da Nang air base, the division extended the Da Nang defense area to the south and southeast. Additional units were brought in from Okinawa and on 8 July, elements of the division landed at Qui Nhon, 146 miles south of Da Nang, creating a fourth operational area.

OVER THE NEXT FOUR YEARS the division successfully executed more than 120 major operations, including Starlite, Hastings, Scotland, Napoleon/Saline, and Dewey Canyon. In Operation Hastings, division units stopped a North Vietnamese Army (NVA) drive into South Vietnam, and laid groundwork for the division's move north, which occurred on 9 October 1966. Many of its units had already been committed to sealing the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) against the northern infiltrators. The two northernmost provinces, Quang Tri and Thua Thien, now became the responsibility of the division.

Marines of the 1st Platoon, Company G, 2d Battalion, 3d Marines, wade a shallow stream on patrol on 6 May 1965, shortly after arrival in Vietnam.

DIVISION UNITS AGAIN STOPPED a breakthrough attempt by the NVA south of the DMZ in the Cam Lo area during Operation Prairie II. The determined resistance the 3d Marine Division made against the NVA at Hills 881 North and South and Hill 861 in the Khe Sanh area showed the enemy the U.S. was going to stay in the isolated northwestern corner of South Vietnam.

REPEATED ARTILLERY and rocket attacks on the Dong Ha combat base generated many attacks and sweeps by division units south of the DMZ. They cleared the area below the zone and penetrated the southern half of the buffer strip to clear out troop concentrations and again stop invasion threats by the North Vietnamese.

THE 3D DIVISION remained in Vietnam until the fall of 1969. Division headquarters, under the command of Major General William K. Jones, returned to Okinawa in November 1969. Since that time, elements of the 3d

Marine Division have embarked in ships of the Seventh Fleet as battalion landing teams. Other units of the 3d Marine Division returned to Indochina to aid in the evacuation of Americans and Vietnamese and Cambodian nationals in the spring of 1975. Marines also served as security detachments on board U.S. Navy ships and American merchant ships during the sea evacuation of Da Nang and as ground security forces at Saigon and Phnom Penh during air evacuations. Elements of the 3d Marine Division played an integral role in the rescue of the crew of the SS Mayaguez captured off the coast of Cambodia in May 1975.

THE 3D MARINE DIVISION continues to maintain its combat-ready posture as a force-in-readiness in the Western Pacific and Indian Ocean areas. In numerous amphibious landings and training exercises throughout the region during the 1970s and early 1980s, the Division, as the ground combat element of III Marine Amphibious Force, has remained a highly visible reminder of American commitment to regional stability.

THE 3D MARINE DIVISION PATCH

The 3d Marine Division shoulder patch worn during World War II is in scarlet and gold, the official colors of the Marine Corps, and consists of a scarlet triangular shield with a narrow gold line near the outer edge. In the center of the shield is a gold and black caltrap, an ancient military instrument with four metal points so disposed that any three of them being on the ground the other projects upward, thereby impeding the progress of the enemy's cavalry. Literally: Don't step on me! Also the three visible points of the caltrap represent the division number. This insignia was authorized in August 1943. In 1947, the wearing of unit shoulder patches by all Marine Corps units was discontinued.

The 3d Marines

THE 3D MARINES was originally activated as the 3d Regiment of Marines on 20 December 1916 at Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, under the command of Colonel Theodore A. Kane. As part of the 2d Provisional Brigade, the regiment's duties in the early part of the occupation consisted of the administration of the military government, disarming of the population, and control of banditry. Because the fundamental aim of the occupation was to bring peace to the Dominican Republic and enable the Dominicans to govern themselves, a native constabulary, the Guardia Nacional Dominicana was formed. Trained and officered in part by Marines of the 3d Regiment, the Guardia was gradually able to assume the duties of protecting life and property and suppressing the bandits that infested the countryside. Throughout World War I, the 3d Regiment remained in the Dominican Republic. The unit was deactivated there on 1 August 1922.

THE 3D MARINES was reactivated on 16 June 1942 at New River, North Carolina under Colonel Oscar R. Cauldwell. Built around a cadre of officers and enlisted men remaining at New River after the 1st Marine Division had mounted out, the new regiment was quickly brought up to strength by a daily influx of recruits arriving directly from Parris Island. In August, the 3d Marines left New River for San Diego. The following month it was deployed overseas, first to Samoa and then to New Zealand. The 3d Marines was reorganized and incorporated as a unit of the 3d Marine Division in June 1943. Combat training continued for the 3d Marines while in New Zealand. The 3d Marine Division was first inspected as a whole in June 1943 and was found fit and combat ready. The division then moved to Guadalcanal, a staging area prior to its commitment to combat.

THE FIRST COMBAT ASSIGNMENT for the regiment, now commanded by Colonel George W. McHenry, was to take part in the invasion of the Japanese-held island of Bougainville. Rehearsals were held at Efate, New Hebrides in October. Assault elements of the 2d Battalion, 3d Marines were the first to hit the beaches of Bougainville on 1 November 1943. The initial waves of the 2d and 3d Battalions reached the beaches with only light opposition, but the 1st Battalion, 3d Marines received heavy fire before landing on its assigned beach. The next day, the Marines expanded their beachhead and pushed inland. Extension of the beachhead continued as the 3d Marines battled a persistent enemy. The 1st Battalion, 3d Marines blunted a Japanese attack on 7 November in the Laruma River area. By 21 November, the 1st and 3d Battalions occupied critical terrain in the Piva Forks area, thereby cutting Japanese supply and communications lines. The regiment had been committed for 27 consecutive days before it exchanged sectors with the 9th Marines. From 28 November until 22 December, the 3d Marines occupied the extreme southern flank of the division line where its patrols had several sharp skirmishes with the Japanese. On Christmas Day, the 3d embarked for Guadalcanal.

Private First Class Luther Skaggs, Jr., receives the Medal of Honor from President Truman, for heroic service with the 3d Battalion, 3d Marines on Guam.

SEVEN MONTHS LATER, the regiment, now commanded by Colonel William C. Hall, was headed for its second combat mission—the invasion of Guam. The 1st and 3d Battalions of the 3d Marines received intense mortar and artillery fire during their assault landing on 21 July 1944. As the first day wore on the 3d Marines met stiff opposition over increasingly difficult terrain. The fighting for the regiment continued with great intensity for the next few days, but the 3d Marines continued to advance. During the night of 25-26 July, after an exhaustive artillery and mortar preparation, the enemy began to counterattack all along the Marine line. The Japanese were driven back with heavy losses, but small groups infiltrated the lines only to be systematically mopped-up on the morning of the 26th. On 10 August 1944 the island was declared secure although sporadic resistance continued. The 3d Marines remained on Guam for mopping-up operations.

THE 3D MARINES next combat assignment was that of floating reserve for the Iwo Jima operation in February 1945. The regiment, under Colonel James A. Stuart, did not land and soon returned to Guam. Guam was still far from being peaceful as many Japanese continued to roam the island. Following Japan's surrender, the 1st Battalion, 3d Marines arrived on Chichi Jima on 10 October 1945 to receive the surrender of the Japanese forces on the island. The 3d Marines sailed for San Diego in December 1945 and was deactivated at Camp Pendleton on 13 January 1946.

LESS THAN TWO YEARS LATER the 3d Marines was reactivated as a battalion-sized organization in Tsingtao, China on 1 October 1947 commanded by Colonel Jaime Sabater. The political situation began to deteriorate as the Chinese Communists made a rapid and successful advance against Chinese Nationalist forces. By December 1948, most American nationals had left China. The 3d Marines went on board ships in February 1949 and sailed for Shanghai the following month to aid in the evacuation of American and foreign nationals. The task completed, the 3d Marines returned to Tsingtao to pick up elements left there, and then sailed for the United States in May. The 3d Marines was stationed at Camp Pendleton until its deactivation on 1 October 1949.

DURING THE KOREAN WAR the 3d Marines, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel John J. Gormley, was reactivated at Camp Pendleton on 20 June 1951 as part of the 3d Marine Brigade. Six months later, in January 1952, it was reassigned to the 3d Marine Division. The division went to Japan in August 1953 and the 3d Marines set up quarters at Camp Fuji-McNair. During its stay in Japan, the regiment conducted many field and landing exercises. The 3d Marines was relocated to Camp Sukiran, Okinawa, in March 1957. Elements of the regiment were deployed to various areas in the Far East when political upheavals or crises occurred between 1957 and 1964.

AS AMERICAN INVOLVEMENT in the war in Vietnam grew, the 1st Battalion, 3d Marines was airlifted to Da Nang in March 1965. The remainder of the regiment, now commanded by Colonel Edwin B. Wheeler, was deployed to Vietnam during April and May 1965. After setting up and occupying positions from the north to the south-central sector of the Da Nang perimeter, the 3d Marines' mission was to eliminate the Viet Cong from its sector. In October 1966, regimental headquarters under Colonel Edward E. Hammerbeck deployed to Camp Carroll in an area immediately south of the demilitarized zone. For the next year, the 3d Marines participated in such operations as Prairie, Cimarron, Hickory, and Lancaster in the Camp Carroll area.

IN FEBRUARY 1968 the 3d Marines took part in Operation Napoleon/Saline along the Cua Viet River. Its mission was to conduct combat operations on both sides of the river to insure free shipping on the river and to deny the enemy access to rocker positions which could be used to fire on Dong Ha and Quang Tri. The 3d Marines participated in Operation Kentucky in December 1968 and assisted Vietnamese forces in pacification of Cam Lo and Huong Hoa District. Operation Maine Crag began in March 1969 when the 3d Marines began sweep and clear operations south of the old Khe Sanh Combat Base. The 3d Marines participated in Operations Virginia Ridge and Idaho Canyon before leaving Vietnam in October 1969.

REDEPLOYMENT TO THE UNITED STATES was completed in November 1969 when the regiment arrived at Camp Pendleton and was assigned to the 5th Marine Amphibious Brigade. In June 1971 the 3d Marines relocated to the Marine Corps Air Station, Kaneohe, Hawaii, and was reassigned to the 1st Marine Brigade, Fleet Marine Force.

SINCE THIS TIME, the regiment has continued to maintain the highest level of combat readiness for amphibious warfare by maintaining a rigorous training schedule on all levels of unit operations, engaging in numerous field and fleet exercises, and by providing battalion landing teams for deployment to the Western Pacific.

The 4th Marines

REVOLUTIONARY TROUBLE IN MEXICO precipitated the activation of the 4th Regiment of Marines at Marine Barracks, Puget Sound, Washington, on 16 April 1914 under the command of Colonel Joseph A. Pendleton. Three times during its first two years the 4th Regiment embarked, stood by afloat off various Mexican west coast ports prepared to land on order. In each case no landing was required, nor did the regiment engage in combat.

IN THE SPRING OF 1916, civil war broke out in the Dominican Republic. Fears for the safety of American and other foreign citizens in the country convinced the American government that intervention in the situation was necessary. Colonel Pendleton's 4th Regiment departed San Diego by rail for New Orleans on 6 June where it boarded the USS Hancock. The regiment arrived in the Dominican Republic on 21 June 1916. In the vigorous campaigning that followed immediately, the 4th Regiment won its first battle honors and sustained its first battle casualties. As additional Marines were committed, it became one component of the three-regiment 2d Provisional Brigade. The 4th Regiment was destined to spend eight years in the Dominican Republic. As in most "bush" or "banana" wars, Marines performed a variety of tasks from policing the hinterland to running the railroads. They also trained a native constabulary to take over their chore of maintaining order once a stable civil government could be established. This occurred in October 1922, and the 4th Regiment sailed for San Diego in the summer of 1924.

FOLLOWING A PERIOD of routine garrison duties and a tour guarding the U.S. mails during the robbery epidemic of 1926-27, the regiment drew the assignment which was to win it fame and the descriptive nickname, the "China Regiment." The cause for alarm in the Far East in early 1927 stemmed from the threat that the Chinese Nationalists would seize Shanghai and endanger the foreign residents there. After standing by on 24-hour alert, the 4th Regiment, under Colonel Charles S. Hill, embarked in the USS Chaumont and sailed from San Diego on 3 February 1927. With the declaration of a state of emergency on 21 March, the 4th Regiment went ashore. The regiment's initial mission became one of reinforcing the Marines already in Shanghai in the prevention of rioting and mob violence within the American sector. A few days after the landing of the 4th Regiment, Brigadier General Smedley D. Butler arrived in Shanghai to take command of all Marine forces ashore. His command was designated as the 3d Brigade.

SHANGHAI FOR THE NEXT FEW YEARS was relatively peaceful and garrison duty for the 4th Regiment passed uneventfully. The 3d Brigade left China in early 1929 leaving the 4th Regiment behind. In February 1930 the regiment's designation was officially changed to the 4th Marines. The security of Shanghai was once again threatened in early 1932 after hostilities broke out between the Chinese and the Japanese. In 1937 the fighting became so intense that the 4th Marines, now commanded by Colonel Charles F.B. Price, and other foreign troops manned the barricades of the International Settlement in Shanghai. The 1937 situation developed into a series of potentially explosive crises as both sides resorted to aerial bombing with considerable carelessness and accompanying indiscriminate antiaircraft and artillery fire. Again reinforcements were rushed in to support the 4th Marines. The 2d Brigade arrived in Shanghai in September 1937. The brigade was withdrawn early in 1938 when a shift of the scene of Sino-Japanese hostilities left Shanghai relatively safe. The 4th Marines once again remained behind.

AS THE THREAT of war between Japan and the United States became greater, the 4th Marines, now commanded by Colonel Samuel L. Howard, departed Shanghai for the Philippines in November 1941. A few days after the Japanese attack on the Philippines on 8 December, the 4th Marines, under tactical command of the Army, moved to Corregidor. Marines in the regiment worked feverishly throughout the protracted siege of the island fortress on defense measures and installations. The Japanese made their assault landing during the dark hours of 5-6 May 1942. In spite of dogged resistance by the defenders, the Japanese gained a toehold on the island. At noon on 6 May 1942 the Americans on Corregidor surrendered. The men of the 4th Marines burned their colors and went into captivity. The regiment temporarily went out of existence.

THE 4TH MARINES was reborn on 1 February 1944 when it was reconstituted from units of the 1st Raider Regiment on Guadalcanal under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Alan Shapley. The Raider regiment's battalions had fought at Guadalcanal, New Georgia, and Bougainville. Following its initial operation in its new capacity, an unopposed seizure of Emirau Island, the regiment returned to Guadalcanal where it was integrated into the 1st Provisional Marine Brigade on 19 April 1944.

THE 1ST PROVISIONAL BRIGADE was assigned to southern beaches in the Agat-Bangi Point area for the assault on Guam. Lieutenant Colonel Shapley's 4th Marines was in the first assault waves that hit the beaches on 21 July 1944. As the regiment moved inland it encountered stiff resistance and the heavy fighting continued throughout the day. During the ensuing night the 4th Marines successfully withstood several enemy counterattacks. The following day the regiment reached the top of Mounr Alifan across difficult terrain and secured the entire ridge line. Shortly before daybreak on 26 July, the 4th Marines led off the offensive on the Orote Peninsula. This objective was finally taken on the 29th. The end of organized resistance on Guam was announced on 10 August. The job of mopping-up Japanese survivors remained and the regiment stayed on Guam for nearly three weeks to aid in this task. It then moved back to its Guadalcanal base.

THE 1ST PROVISIONAL MARINE BRIGADE was redesignated as the 6th Marine Division on 7 September 1944. The division's initial combat mission was to secure the northern half of Okinawa. Lack of opposition during the landing on 1 April 1945 enabled the Marines to make significant gains in the first few days. The division reached Motobu Peninsula on 8 April and encountered its first serious opposition. Mount Yaetake formed the core of the Japanese defense and was the primary target of the 4th Marines. The struggle for the mountain was bitterly contested until 16 April when Marines from the 3d Battalion secured the summit. The 6th Marine Division moved south after northern Okinawa was declared secure. During the opening phase of the drive, the 4th Marines remained in division reserve. On 19 May, the regiment relieved the exhausted 29th Marines and played a major role in the advance that resulted in the capture of Naha. The next assignment of the 6th Division was the seizure of Oroku Peninsula. For a week the 4th Marines, with the 29th Marines, fought a well-entrenched enemy. Finally on 13 June the peninsula was undisputably in American hands.

THE 6TH MARINE DIVISION returned to Guam to set up a new base and trained for the planned invasion of Japan. It was during this time that Japan surrendered. The 4th Marines received the honor of spearheading the U.S. occupation of Japan, while the 6th Division was slated for occupation duty in North China. The regiment, now commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Fred D. Beans, landed at Yokosuka on 30 August 1945 to take over naval and air facilities. Early in 1946 the regiment redeployed to Tsingtao, China. In September 1946 the 4th Marines departed China for Norfolk, Virginia leaving behind the 3d Battalion which was deactivated there on 1 October 1947. The rest of the 4th Marines was assigned to the 2d Marine Division at Camp Lejeune and reassigned to the 2d Provisional Marine Regiment in early 1949. The 4th Marines was deactivated on 17 October 1949.

THE 4TH MARINES, under the command of Colonel Robert O. Bowen, was reactivated at Camp Pendleton, California on 2 September 1952 as part of the 3d Marine Division.

The division was deployed to Japan in August 1953. While stationed there the 4th Marines was engaged in numerous exercises to maintain its combat efficiency. Less than 18 months after its arrival in Japan, the regiment was transferred to the Territory of Hawaii in February 1955 to become the ground echelon of the 1st Provisional Marine Air-Ground Task Force which was located at Kaneohe Bay. Redesignation of the task force to the 1st Marine Brigade took place on 1 May 1956.

THE 4TH MARINES' combat readiness was put to the test in early 1965 when the American involvement in the war in Vietnam was enlarged. After arriving at Chu Lai in May 1965, the regiment, now commanded by Colonel Edward P. Dupras, Jr., rejoined its parent 3d Marine Division. The first major engagement for the regiment was Operation Starlite. The remainder of 1965 saw elements of the 4th Marines engaging the enemy mostly in small unit actions. During the spring of 1966, the regiment shifted its operations from the southern to the northern part of the I Corps Tactical Zone of South Vietnam.

DURING THE TET OFFENSIVE, launched in January 1968, Viet Cong and North Vietnamese attacked cities and military installations throughout South Vietnam. The 2d Battalion in April 1968 was involved in especially bitter clashes near Dong Ha and along the Cua Viet River. Contact with enemy forces tapered off for the 4th Marines in the fall of 1968, although the regiment continued to conduct operations into the middle of 1969. With the announced withdrawal of American troops in 1969, the 4th Marines, now commanded by Colonel Gilbert R. Hershey, was ordered to Okinawa. All elements were redeployed by the end of November.

DURING THE EARLY 1970s the 4th Marines was involved with intensive training programs for amphibious warfare, civil disturbance, air mount-out, weapons requalification, and physical readiness.

THE 4TH MARINES Headquarters was activated as Regimental Landing Team - 4, 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade from 18 April to 12 May 1975 to aid in the evacuations of Americans, Vietnamese, and Cambodians from Saigon and the surrounding areas. Under the command of Colonel Alfred M. Gray, the unit provided battalion landing teams and an air contingency battalion landing team for operations during this period.

IN APRIL 1979, the 4th Marines relocated from Camp Hansen to Camp Schwab, Okinawa.

The 9th Marines

THE 9TH MARINES was originally activated on 20 November 1917 at Quantico, Virginia as the 9th Regiment of Marines. Several days after its activation, Lieutenant Colonel Frederic L. Bradman took command of the regiment. It was part of the great expansion of the Marine Corps during World War I. After a few short weeks of training the regiment was ordered to the Caribbean. Cuban sugar was vitally needed for the Allied war effort and the United States feared German influence in the area. After its arrival at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, on 24 December 1917 the 9th Regiment was joined with the 7th Regiment to become the 3d Provisional Brigade. The situation in Cuba improved and Marines of the 9th Regiment were ordered to Texas to forestall the possible disruption by German agents of vital shipments from the Mexican oil fields. Upon arrival at Galveston in August 1918, the regiment went into camp at Fort Crockett. Through the remainder of World War I, the Marines spent their time in training and guard duty. When the war ended, the 9th embarked for Philadelphia where, on 25 April 1919, it was deactivated.

THE 9TH MARINES was reactivated on 12 February 1942 at Camp Elliott, San Diego as part of the 2d Marine Division. Colonel Lemuel C. Shepherd, Jr., took command of the regiment in March 1942. In September 1942 the 9th Marines was reassigned to the newly activated 3d Marine Division at Camp Pendleton. The regiment was deployed to Auckland, New Zealand in January-February 1943. Here intensive jungle and amphibious training was held. Approximately 18 months after its activation, the 9th Marines was ordered into combat. On D-Day, 1 November 1943, the 9th Marines, now commanded by Colonel Edward A. Craig, landed on beaches at Empress Augusta Bay, Bougainville, then advanced inland. By 23 November it had moved as far as the impassable swamps to its front would allow. After exchanging sectors with the 3d Marines, the unit participated in the battle of Piva Forks. The 9th Marines was relieved on the front lines after spending 57 days helping to clear the Japanese from the Empress Augusta Bay area.

GUAM WAS THE NEXT OBJECTIVE for the men of the 9th Marines. Early on 21 July 1944, the amphibian tractors carrying the first assault waves of Colonel Craig's 9th Marines came ashore on the island in the face of Japanese defending fire. The next day the regiment pushed rapidly south along the shore to seize the Piti Navy Yard, and then moved into the hills to help drive out the Japanese. With this task accomplished, the unit became involved in securing the northern portion of Guam. The 9th reached the cliffs on the north coast on the afternoon of 9 August. With the end of organized resistance, the regiment participated in mopping-up operations on Guam.

EMBARKING ON BOARD SHIPS in February 1945, the 9th Marines sailed from Guam for Iwo Jima, arriving in the floating reserve area on D-Day, 19 February. Five days later, the regiment, now commanded by Colonel Howard N. Kenyon, landed and moved up to the front. The Japanese controlled the rough, high ground and the 3d Marine Division was tasked with clearing the critical central portion of the Motoyama Plateau by means of a frontal assault. On the morning of 25 February, the 9th Marines passed through the front lines on the southern edge of Motoyama Airfield No. 2. For three days the Marines fought on and around the airfield. The Marines were able to drive the Japanese from two hills before being relieved by the 21st Marines. On 1 March, the 9th Marines again went into the lines, this time just east of the village of Motoyama. The fighting continued for the 9th Marines until 16 March. After mopping-up operations, the unit returned to Guam. With the end of the war, the regiment returned to Camp Pendleton where it was deactivated on 31 December 1945.

THE 9TH MARINES came back into existence on 1 October 1947 on Guam, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Ralph A. Collins, Jr. For the next year, the 9th, which was activated at battalion strength, was occupied with usual peacetime activities. By November 1948 the civil war in China began seriously to endanger the safety of many Americans. The 9th Marines embarked for China. It remained on board ships ready to land should American lives and property be threatened. One rifle company and some of the reinforcing units went ashore to serve as a reserve force at Tsingtao. For the next three months, the 9th was engaged in evacuation operations, performing the Marines' traditional role of protectors of American lives, interests, and property in the Shanghai area. The 9th Marines then sailed for Camp Lejeune, arriving there in May 1949 and was assigned to the 2d Provisional Marine Regiment. On 17 October, the unit was deactivated.

DURING THE KOREAN WAR, the 9th Marines was again reactivated under the command of Colonel John J. Gormley at Camp Pendleton on 17 March 1952 as part of the 3d Marine Division. In the summer of 1953, the 3d Marine Division was ordered to Japan. The regiment with other elements of the division was constantly undergoing intensive training in amphibious and land warfare while in Japan. In January 1956, the 9th was redeployed to Sukiran, Okinawa, where the training continued. When a Communist buildup in Southeast Asia threatened Thailand, the 3d Battalion, 9th Marines proceeded to the Udorn area and remained there until the danger passed. The regiment was permanently stationed on Okinawa until it was committed to Vietnam in 1965.

BATTALION LANDING TEAM (BLT) 3/9 landed on the beaches of Da Nang, Republic of Vietnam, on 8 March 1965 to spearhead the landing of Marine ground units. Marines of the 3d Battalion immediately took up the mission of providing security for the Da Nang Air Base. The battalion continued the security of the air base and its immediate area until relieved by the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines on 17 June when the 3d Battalion returned to Okinawa. On 4 July 1965, the 9th Marines regimental Headquarters, commanded by Colonel Frank E. Garretson, and the 2d Battalion, 9th Marines arrived in Da Nang from Okinawa. The 3d Battalion returned to Vietnam in the middle of August.

FROM ITS INITIAL LANDING until early 1967, the regiment operated in the area south of Da Nang. Throughout the months of 1966 and early 1967, the 9th Marines conducted numerous search and clear operations to find the enemy, while strengthening the civic action programs to secure relations with the Vietnamese people, and free the people from the constant threat of Viet Cong terrorism. Noteworthy operations during this period were Macon, Mississippi, Independence, and Gulf.

THE REGIMENT MOVED NORTH to Dong Ha where, for more than a year, elements of the 9th Marines operated in such places as Con Thien, Camp Carroll, and Gio Linh. Late in January 1968, during the Tet Offensive, an element of the regiment was sent to the Khe Sanh area where it participated in Operation Scotland. Under the operational control of the 26th Marines, men from the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines helped to hold the besieged Khe Sanh Combat Base against North Vietnamese attacks. After the breakout at Khe Sanh, the 9th Marines began conducting operations around the Rockpile and Vandegrift Combat Base.

THE 9TH MARINES was given the task of denying the enemy access to the Ashau Valley in January 1969. This marked the beginning of Operation Dewey Canyon. For the remainder of its time in Vietnam, the regiment participated in Operations Apache Snow and Cameron Falls.

THE 9TH MARINES redeployed during July and August 1969 to Camp Schwab, Okinawa, and came under the operational control of the 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade. During November 1969, the regiment was reassigned to the 3d Marine Division.

THROUGHOUT THE 1970S and early 1980s, the 9th Marines has conducted numerous training exercises, amphibious demonstrations, and battalion landing team tactical tests. The alert operational posture of the regiment was successfully tested in April 1975 when elements of the 9th Marines participated in the emergency evacuations in South Vietnam.

AS THE "STRIKING NINTH" moves through the 1980s, the regiment continues to maintain a high degree of combat readiness in all operational areas.

The 12th Marines

THE 12TH REGIMENT of Marines (Infantry), commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Jesse F. Dyer, was originally activated at Tientsin, China, on 4 October 1927 as a part of the 3d Brigade. The brigade, under the command of Brigadier General Smedley D. Butler, was engaged in security measures for the protection of American lives and interests in the Tientsin-Shanghai area. However, the need for the Marine Corps to exercise rigid economy in the employment of its officer and enlisted personnel because of unusual demands on the Corps in both China and Nicaragua led Major General Commandant John A. LeJeune to order the deactivation of the regiment. On 22 April 1928, it was deactivated with one battalion going to the 4th Regiment and the other to the 6th Regiment.

THE 12TH MARINES, under the command of Colonel John B. Wilson, was reactivated at Camp Elliott, California, on 1 September 1942, as the artillery regiment of the 3d Marine Division. It moved to Camp Dunlap, Niland, California, a month later. The regiment began moving by increments to New Zealand in January 1943. Although the arrival of the 3d Battalion in May 1943 brought all four battalions to New Zealand, the regiment was hardly physically united, as the battalions were attached to regimental combat teams and were widely dispersed over the northern part of the island.

BOUGAINVILLE, the largest island in the Solomon Islands, became the Allies' target after the capture of Guadalcanal and New Georgia. The first step was to move the 3d Marine Division from New Zealand to Guadalcanal for training. The division then proceeded to Efate, New Hebrides, in October for a complete rehearsal of the projected landing. After the week-long exercises were completed, the division embarked for Bougainville.

TROOPS OF THE 12TH MARINES were busily engaged in getting guns and ammunition ashore on D-Day, 1 November 1943, and various battalions were in position by the end of the day, firing several registrations in preparation for action the first night. The remaining battalions were ready for support missions the following day. The effectiveness of the artillery on Bougainville may be measured by the estimate that half the enemy dead in the Empress Augusta Bay area were the result of artillery shelling. The artillery preparation for the Piva Forks battle was described by Major General Allen H. Turnage, the 3d Marine Division commander, as; "Probably the most accurate I have ever known."

THE NEXT CAMPAIGN for Colonel Wilson's 12th Marines was the recapture of Guam, with the initial landing on 21 July 1944. The 3d Battalion, 12th Marines landed early and was in action less than four hours after the first wave hit the beach. All the artillery was ashore with all batteries in position and firing later that afternoon. The battle for Guam placed emphasis upon the fact that the key to effective fire support was rapid and efficient communication between forward observers and fire direction centers. The regiment used radios when necessary but wire communication was employed for most message traffic.

IN SEPTEMBER 1944, Admiral Nimitz advised Lieutenant General Holland M. Smith, commanding FMFPac, that it was desirable to retain both the 2d and 3d Marine Divisions in the Marianas for the planned attack on Iwo Jima. The plans being developed called for the 3d Division to be a reserve afloat and available on D-plus 3. The 12th Marines, now commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Raymond F. Crist, Jr., entered the picture on D-plus 5 (24 February 1945) landing just after noon. The days of the battle for Iwo Jima were marked by continuous artillery fire, day and night, in an attempt to soften the Japanese positions for the hard-pressed Marine infantrymen.

AFTER THE CAMPAIGN, the 12th Marines returned to Guam to rebuild and retrain for the next operation—the invasion of the home islands of Japan. By August 1945 the 12th Marines and the rest of the 3d Division were ready for the campaign, but the end of the war made this final effort unnecessary. The regimental strength dwindled with the end of the war. On 31 October 1945, the 3d Battalion, 12th Marines was deactivated on Guam. The regiment was detached from the 3d Marine Division on 1 December 1945 and embarked that same day for the United States. The 12th Marines was deactivated on 8 January 1946 at Camp Pendleton.

THE REGIMENT WAS REACTIVATED on 17 March 1952 at Camp Pendleton. In August 1953, the 12th Marines, now under Colonel Leonard F. Chapman, Jr., sailed from San Diego for Yokohama. Upon arrival in Japan the regiment was sent to Camp McNair where a program of continuous training began. Specialized training included participation in Operation Lotus in Okinawa in January 1954 where the troops received extensive training in the harsh ridges and the tough undergrowth.

THE 12TH MARINES (less the 3d Battalion) participated in an amphibious exercise on Iwo Jima in February 1956. Following this exercise, the regiment was transferred to Okinawa. The period of time from 1956 to 1964 was marked by routine training exercises including many SEATO maneuvers. This relative calm was interrupted in 1957 by a brief deployment of 1st Battalion, 12th Marines as part of a task force of the 3d Division that stood by offshore during a governmental crisis in Indonesia when American and foreign citizens were in danger. Later in May 1962, when the government of Thailand requested military assistance from SEATO, maneuvers in the Philippines were broken off, and BLT 3/9 was ordered to meet the request. The unit was transported to Bangkok and sent ashore. Detachments of Headquarters Battery and Battery F from the 2d Battalion were attached to BLT 3/9 for this operation.

ABOUT THIS TIME several new batteries were organized for service with the 12th Marines. Two new 4.2-inch mortar batteries, one for the 1st Battalion and one for the 2d Battalion, and a 107mm battery, designated the Howtar Battery, were all activated on 25 June 1962.

DURING 1964 elements of the 12th Marines (seldom more than a battery) were afloat off the coast of Vietnam in the South China Sea with the Marine Special Landing Force (SLF). The first elements of the regiment landed in Vietnam on 8 March 1965 and were followed by additional units. By July 1965 nearly the entire regiment, now commanded by Colonel James K. Callender, was in Vietnam, actively participating in the conflict as a part of the 3d Marine Division, III Marine Amphibious Force.

ELEMENTS OF THE REGIMENT participated in a number of operations in 1965 and 1966 including Starlite, Prairie, New York, and Hastings. On 6 January 1967 at Phu Bai, after the regiment received additional self-propelled 155mm howitzers, the 1st Provisional 155mm Howitzer Battery, 4th Battalion, 12th Marines was activated. By the close of 1967, the 12th Marines had become the largest de facto regiment in Marine Corps history with eleven battalions, including three Army battalions, under the operational control of the 12th regimental headquarters.

Artillerymen of the 2d Battalion, 12th Marines, at Con Thien, South Vietnam, fire high explosive and white phosphorous shells from a 105mm howitzer at a North Vietnamese Army unit on 19 October 1967.

THE ARRIVAL OF TET, the Vietnamese New Year, in January 1968 brought with it major attacks by enemy forces. Batteries of the 12th Marines in Quang Tri Province were heavily involved in the fighting. During the remainder of 1968, elements of the regiment fired a number of artillery missions into the demilitarized zone and the southern panhandle of North Vietnam. Combat operations, although fewer in number in 1969, carried the fight to the enemy's western base areas, cutting his lines of communication and supply and destroying his hidden war material. In mid-1969 the American withdrawal from Vietnam began. The 2d Battalion, 12th Marines redeployed to Okinawa in July 1969. The last elements of the 12th Marines, then under the command of Colonel Wallace W. Crompton, left Vietnam in December 1969.

DURING APRIL AND MAY 1975 elements of the 12th Marines supported Operations Eagle Pull and Frequent Wind in Cambodia and South Vietnam. The deployment of two ships' detachments and five batteries in support of these contingencies with little or no advance notification reflected the high state of operational and embarkation readiness of the 12th Marines.

THROUGHOUT THE 1970S and early 1980s, the 12th Marines has continued to provide artillery support for the 3d

Marine Division by participating in battalion landing team deployments and in division and regimental command post exercises and field firing exercises on Okinawa, in Japan, the Philippines, and the Republic of Korea. Numerous combined exercises have been conducted throughout this period with the Republic of Korea Marines.

THE 12TH MARINES is meeting the challenges of the 1980s and is confident of its readiness and ability to support the mission of the 3d Marine Division.

The 21st Marines

THE 21ST MARINES was activated on 14 July 1942 at New River, North Carolina. Colonel Daniel E. Campbell took command of the regiment at the end of the month. During July, August, and September, the three infantry battalions of the regiment were activated using men from the 6th Marines as the nucleus and adding personnel from Quantico and Parris Island. An intensive combat training program was began.

IN OCTOBER the regiment became part of the 3d Marine Division and was relocated to Camp Elliott, California, where training continued. Early in February 1943 the 21st Marines deployed to Auckland, New Zealand. Units of the regiment were billeted in a number of small camps over an area of several square miles. The final training for the regiment was conducted on Guadalcanal before the 21st Marines was ordered into combat.

DURING THE INITIAL PHASE of the Bougainville campaign the 21st Marines, under the command of Colonel Evans O. Ames, remained offshore in division reserve. On 6 November the 1st Battalion, 21st Marines landed and was attached to the 9th Marines. The remaining units of the regiment went ashore between 11-17 November. One company of the 3d Battalion was on board the USS McKean when it was attacked and sunk by enemy aircraft in Empress Augusta Bay. Thirty-eight men were reported missing. By the 20th all battalions had reverted to the 21st Marines' control and the regiment moved south. For the next few weeks fighting was light with no major action against enemy forces. During the second week in December 1943, however, the regiment became involved in the fighting around Hellzapoppin Ridge, Hill 600, and Hill 600A. The regiment's primary task was to reduce these positions and drive the remaining Japanese east of the Torokina River. The thick jungle and narrow trails added to the Marines' difficulties as they attempted to dislodge the enemy. Hellzapoppin Ridge fell on 18 December and Hill 600A was taken five days later. The 21st Marines was relieved by the 182d Infantry Regiment and on 9 January 1944 it embarked for the return to Guadalcanal.

THE REGIMENT'S NEXT OPERATION was the recapture of Guam. On 21 July 1944, the 21st Marines went ashore in the first waves of troops in the center of the 3d Division's Asan beachhead. The steeply sloping terrain provided excellent cover for the Japanese and precluded any rapid advance. Early on the morning of 26 July the enemy launched a coordinated counterattack, including a wild bayonet charge, against the Marines. The Japanese were driven back with heavy losses. The 21st Marines, now under the command of Colonel Arthur H. Butler, with the rest of the 3d Division, prepared to drive northeast along the length of the island. On 31 July, the 21st Marines left its line of departure and pushed steadily ahead through the rugged terrain. The regiment, on 1 August, passed into division reserve for a short time. Four days later, the 21st Marines with the 3d Marines moved toward Bijia Point meeting only isolated pockets of resistance. As the Marines combed the northern jungle, they encountered only disorganized remnants of the enemy. Guam was declared secure on 10 August, but the 21st Marines continued to patrol the northern jungles for disorganized remnants of the enemy.

Major General Graves B. Erskine, seated rear, Commanding General, 3d Marine Division, and Vice Admiral Richmond K. Turner, who commanded the expeditionary forces, talk with Marines at the command post of the 21st Marines on Iwo Jima in 1945.

THE 21ST MARINES remained on Guam until it received orders for its next objective—Iwo Jima. The regiment left Guam a day earlier than the rest of the 3d Division, but when the unit arrived off Iwo, it went into corps reserve. On D plus 1, 20 February 1945, the regiment, now commanded by Colonel Hartnoll J. Withers, was ordered to land. The confusion and congestion on the beaches made the landing dangerous. The 21st Marines finally came ashore in heavy surf on 21 February. Early the next morning the regiment moved out to relieve the 23d Marines and was ordered to advance on the high ground between Airfields No. 1 and No. 2. The scarred and pitted terrain made progress slow and costly. On D plus 5 elements of the 21st Marines crossed Airfield No. 2 and were involved in heavy fighting in the area. The regiment went into reserve the following day. At dawn on D plus 9 it passed through the 9th Marines and resumed the attack. The 1st Battalion, 21st Marines advanced rapidly and captured the village of Motoyama and the high ground above Airfield No. 3. The 21st Marines continued forward in spite of heavy losses. On 7 March, the 21st Marines with the 9th Marines participated in a flanking movement to isolate an enemy strongpoint known as "Cushman's Pocket." It was finally destroyed on 16 March and Iwo Jima was declared secure.

WITH THE BATTLE of Iwo Jima over, the 21st Marines returned to Guam. Here training continued for the planned invasion of the Japanese homeland. After the surrender of Japan, the 2d Battalion, 21st Marines occupied the island of Truk. The 21st Marines was deactivated on Guam on 20 December 1945. The 2d Battalion left Truk in February and was deactivated on Guam on 5 March 1946.

The 26th Marines

THE 26TH MARINES was activated at Camp Pendleton, California on 10 January 1944 as part of the 5th Marine Division. Lieutenant Colonel Lester S. Hamel was the regiment's first commanding officer. During early July, the regiment participated in exercises on San Clemente Island, some 60 miles off the coast of California. The regiment embarked on board the USS Elliott, Baxter, Clay, and Arthur Middleton at San Diego on 21 July and arrived at Hilo, Hawaii 10 days later. Once there the 26th Marines was sent 65 miles inland to the former camp of the 2d Marine Division on the Parker Ranch at Kamuela known as "Camp Tarawa." Training and amphibious maneuvers continued while the regiment was in the Hawaiian Islands. In late January 1945, the 26th Marines sailed from Pearl Harbor. The convoy reached Eniwetok for refueling and then sailed on to Saipan. Iwo Jima was now the next stop.

A perimeter guard turns away from the dust raised by a CH-46 as it lands near the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, during training at Camp Pendleton, California, in June 1966.

ALTHOUGH THE 26TH MARINES had been placed in reserve, the entire regiment, commanded by Colonel Chester B. Graham, was on Iwo Jima by dusk on D-Day, 19 February 1945. The regiment held the center of the 5th Division's beachhead during the first night, but continued in division reserve for the next couple of days. On D plus 3 the regiment passed through the 27th Marines' lines and slowly advanced to the northeast. The 26th Marines participated in the attack on Airfield No. 2 and then moved northwest toward Hill 362A. Once the battle for 362A was over, the 26th Marines faced bloody fighting around the rocky terrain of Hill 362B and Nishi Ridge. At times the Marines were involved in fierce hand-to-hand combat. Casualties were high. By the end of the campaign, the 26th Marines had lost 650 men killed in action and died of wounds and 2,025 wounded in action. As the regiment reduced the last enemy resistance in the northwest, its 1st Battalion broke through to the sea. On 16 March 1945 Iwo Jima was declared secure.

THE 26TH MARINES sailed back to Hawaii at the end of March. By mid-April the 26th had reached Hilo and returned to its former camp site to begin the process of rebuilding. The return of many of the wounded as well as replacement drafts soon restored the regiment to strength while drill and training went on for the anticipated assault on southern Kyushu, in the Japanese islands. The unconditional surrender of Japan on 14 August 1945 made this assault unnecessary. The 5th Division was ordered to Japan for occupation duty. The 26th Marines boarded ships on 23 August and sailed from Pearl Harbor a week later. The convoy arrived at dawn on 22 September off Sasebo in northwestern Kyushu. The Marines were to dispose of enemy war materiel and supervise both the return of Japanese to their homeland and the repatriation of Chinese and Korean citizens.

THE REGIMENT, which had responsibility for patrolling the areas north and east of Sasebo, was alerted on 13 October for transfer to the Palau Islands and arrived there two weeks later. Elements of the regiment took up garrison duty on Koror, Malakal, and Arakabesan. In late January 1946, the 26th Marines, at greatly reduced strength, sailed for the United States. The regiment was deactivated at Camp Pendleton on 5 March 1946.

AS THE VIETNAM WAR intensified, the 26th Marines was reactivated on 1 March 1966 at Camp Pendleton. The first elements of the regiment were deployed to the Republic of Vietnam in August 1966, when the 1st and 2d Battalions landed at Da Nang. The regimental headquarters reached Okinawa in the same month. The 3d Battalion arrived in Vietnam in October, completing the deployment of the 26th Marines' battalions. In April 1967, the headquarters departed Okinawa for Phu Bai and was assigned to the 3d Marine Division. The following month, the headquarters and the 1st Battalion relieved other 3d Marine Division units at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in western Quang Tri Province. The 3d Battalion arrived at Khe Sanh in June 1967. During the next few months these units participated in Operations Crockett, Ardmore, and Scotland I.

IN JANUARY 1968, the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines arrived at Khe Sanh, bringing the entire regiment together for the first time since its arrival in Vietnam. The 26th Marines was now commanded by Colonel David E. Lownds. Khe Sanh became the focal point of enemy activity in I Corps as the enemy continued a major buildup in the area, heavily shelled the base, and attacked the surrounding hill outposts. As the weather improved in early March, an exodus of major North Vietnamese units from the Khe Sanh area began to take place, although the enemy still maintained pressure on the combat base.

AS THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH ENDED and the roads opened up to the base, the 26th Marines participated in Operation Scotland II from 15-18 April 1968. On 18 May, the regiment moved to the Da Nang area where it took part in a number of operations including Mameluke Thrust, Houston, and Meade River.

DURING 1969, elements of the 26th Marines operated as the Special Landing Force off the coast of Vietnam. With the withdrawal of the 3d Marine Division in the fall of 1969, the 26th Marines was reassigned to the 1st Division. In March 1970, the regiment returned to Camp Pendleton where it was deactivated on 30 April 1970.
